

It is almost universally true that entertainment medias are keen on prying into personal lives of public figures, especially of popular singers and well-loved movie stars, for whom it is hardly to escape from exposure of private affairs. While I agree it's an inevitable cost for being famous, I believe it's harmful and immoral to sneak into celebrities' secret sphere.

Celebrities are generally charming and attractive to ordinary people, making the people curious about details of their lives, such has been the unfortunate reality in the society that people even are willing to allocate time and resources on such interest. As we all know, whenever there are buyers, there is a profitable business, this is the original and powerful driving force for the recreation journalists to take actions on behalf of the fans to put the stars under surveillance.

However, public interest is unlikely to justify the fact of stealing and make us to turn a deaf ear to the appalling phenomenon. First, disclosing the privacy is offensive and bothering for the celebrities, for whom normal and peaceful leisure time is extremely luxury; Second, bringing personal details to the view of public audience is valueless and distraction, which is particularly awful among young students, recent research shows that study efficiency of Star fans who are intensive idol followers are fifty percent lower.

To conclude, Chasing by paparazzi is an unfortunate fate that befalls celebrities, therefore from my opinion, peeking into the privacy of the well-known people should be discouraged as it results in detrimental consequences.